Youth, Diversity, and the Language of Abstraction: Taking Work Home Abstract The purpose of this paper is to examine the role of working class youth in relation to the problem of cultural heterogeneity and the problem of language of the abstract. Through an analysis of the “bricolage” poetry of three young working class youth writers, Robin Goodfellow, Cornel West, and Jordan Peterson, the paper argues for a need to consider working class youth as agents of not only resistance, but also of cultural transformation. The paper argues for a cultural praxis that includes a greater awareness of the political reality that we inhabit, the construction of communities that are politically conscious, and the creation of cultures that serve as potential sites of political activity. Finally, the paper argues that poetry written in “abstract” registers can serve as
