The spontaneously hypertensive rat (SHR) has been used as a model of human hypertension. This strain has proven useful in hypertension research, and several genes have been associated with the development of hypertension in this rat strain. The results of this study were obtained from SHR rats that were placed on an enriched salt diet from 1-30 days of age and on a purified diet from 31-60 days of age. This study investigated the renal and cardiovascular responses to decreased salt intake in the two age periods. Results indicated that the cardiovascular and renal responses are different in the two periods. In both salt- and acid-treated animals, the cardiovascular response was predominantly a salt-induced increase in blood pressure. In contrast, the renal response was predominantly an acid-induced decrease in creatinine clearance. The findings suggest that the responses to dietary changes may be tissue-specific and should be taken into consideration when deciding on a treatment for this rat model. Identification of mRNAs preferentially translated in post-mitotic cells and in neural tissues. Numerous proteins are localized to specialized subcellular compartments and participate in the regulation of events at these sites. A recent understanding of mRNA translation has identified signals in the 5'untranslated region (5'UTR) of many mRNAs that have an important role in targeting the ribosome to selected subcellular sites. To understand the roles of the signals on the translational regulation of target mRNAs, we have established several
